The 2011 Annual Meeting of the Society for the Historians of American Foreign Relations was a successful chance for me to present my research to a new body of scholars, to learn about new perspectives on my research, and to network with historians from around the globe. This was my first time to present at the Annual Meeting of the Society for the Historians of American Foreign Relations. I learned much from the other papers and commentary, as well as the featured lectures by senior scholars, during the conference. Much of my contact with historians of the United States deals with the periodization of my research - the "Early American Republic." Attending the SHAFR conference allowed for me to understand my research against a broader time period. These questions of public/cultural diplomacy are better studied in the 20th century - this will help me to understand my research sources better. Because of the SHAFR conference, I will be able to relate my research according to new and different methodologies and questions. My panel "The Evolution of American Cultural Diplomacy in the 19th and 20th Centuries: Paris Salons, Dresden Wild West Shows, and World Expos, included a German presenter, Nadine Zimmerli, from the University of Wisconsin at Madison and an Italian, the Commentator and Chair of the panel, Alessandro Brogi from the University of Arkansas. Other panels offered fresh perspectives on cultural diplomacy. Overall, the conference was intellectually stimulating. Dr. Brogi, the panel chair, suggested that the panel might provide a framework for a future conference or a collective book, the work of me and other historians, on the history of cultural diplomacy. The comments/questions from the audience and panel will help towards revision of the paper into an article or book chapter.
